Passage 1 :

In modern society, family dynamics have changed significantly compared to the past. Traditionally, the father was the sole breadwinner who earned money for the entire household, while the mother worked as an unpaid homemaker managing child-rearing and domestic chores. Today, economic demands mean that both parents usually maintain full-time jobs, requiring household chores to be divided equitably.

Sociological research indicates that when fathers actively help with cooking and cleaning, marital happiness increases. Furthermore, teenagers who share chores develop vital life competencies. They learn how to prepare meals, wash laundry, and manage time efficiently—practical skills essential for independent adult life. Performing daily chores also helps teenagers appreciate their parents' hard work more deeply.

[I] Conversely, parents who shelter their children from all housework under the belief that academic study is the only priority may unintentionally harm them. [II] Teenagers without chore experience often struggle with personal autonomy when living alone in university dormitories. [III] They can feel overwhelmed when facing routine tasks such as cooking meals or tidying living spaces. [IV]

In conclusion, sharing chores is not merely a daily burden, but an effective way to strengthen family connections and nurture self-discipline. When everyone contributes equally, the household becomes a genuinely warm and supportive sanctuary for all members.

Passage 2:

Humanity is currently facing critical environmental problems, and global climate change is considered the most serious threat. The extensive burning of coal, oil, and gas releases billions of metric tons of carbon dioxide annually, trapping atmospheric heat and causing runaway temperature increases worldwide.

To tackle this crisis, many nations are actively developing "Zero-Carbon Cities." These smart urban centers are designed to release virtually no net greenhouse gases. [I] In such cities, traditional gasoline-powered cars are banned from downtown avenues. [II] Instead, public transportation powered by clean solar, wind, and hydrogen energy is provided for all inhabitants. Safe cycling lanes and pedestrian walkways are built everywhere to reduce traffic congestion and enhance urban air quality. [III]

Eco-friendly architecture is an integral component of these green cities. Modern buildings are equipped with rooftop solar panels, smart thermal insulation, and rainwater collection systems to conserve natural resources. [IV] Furthermore, municipal organic waste is transformed into valuable agricultural fertilizer rather than being dumped into overflowing landfills.

Transitioning to zero-carbon infrastructure undoubtedly requires substantial financial investment and strong political will. Buying a music album was often expensive, and listeners could only enjoy songs while staying near a CD player or a radio. [III] Furthermore, having instant access to unlimited music can make young people lose focus while studying. [IV]
